

You loved your last book...but what are you going to read next?

Using our unique guidance tools, Lovereading will help you find new books to keep you inspired and entertained.

Opening Extract from...

Thursday's Child

Written by Nicci French

Published by Penguin Books Ltd

All text is copyright © of the author

This Opening Extract is exclusive to Lovereading.
Please print off and read at your leisure.

Thursday's Child

NICCI FRENCH

PENGUIN BOOKS

PENGUIN BOOKS

UK | USA | Canada | Ireland | Australia
India | New Zealand | South Africa

Penguin Books is part of the Penguin Random House group of companies whose addresses can be found at global.penguinrandomhouse.com.

Penguin
Random House
UK

First published as Thursday's Children by Michael Joseph 2014

Published in Penguin Books 2015

001

Text copyright © Joined-Up Writing, 2014

Map of the River Walbrook © Maps Illustrated, 2014

The moral right of the author has been asserted

Set in Garamond MT Std

Typeset by Palimpsest Book Production Ltd, Falkirk, Stirlingshire

Printed in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, St Ives plc

A CIP catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

B FORMAT ISBN: 978-0-241-95035-7

A FORMAT ISBN: 978-1-405-91915-9

www.greenpenguin.co.uk

Penguin Random House is committed to a sustainable future for our business, our readers and our planet. This book is made from Forest Stewardship Council® certified paper.

He that has eyes to see and ears to hear may convince himself that no mortal can keep a secret. If his lips are silent, he chatters with his fingertips; betrayal oozes out of him at every pore.

Sigmund Freud

I

It started with a reunion and it ended with a reunion and Frieda Klein hated reunions. She was sitting in front of her fire, listening to its slow crackle. Beside her was Sasha, who was staring into the glow. Beside Sasha was a buggy. In the buggy was Sasha's ten-month-old son, Ethan, a blur of dark hair and soft snoring. A cat lay at Frieda's feet, faintly purring. They could hear the wind blowing outside. It had been a day of fog and swirling leaves and gusts of wind. Now it was dark and they were inside, hiding from the approaching winter.

'I've got to admit,' said Sasha, 'that I'm intrigued by the idea of meeting an old school friend of yours.'

'She wasn't a friend. She was in my class.'

'What does she want?'

'I don't know. She rang me up and said she needed to see me. She said it was important and that she'd be here at seven.'

'What time is it now?'

Frieda looked at her watch.

'Almost seven.'

'I don't know things like that any more. Since Ethan was born, I've forgotten what a night's sleep is like and my brain has turned into sludge. I don't even know what day it is. Is it Wednesday?'

'Thursday.'

'That's good. Almost the weekend.'

Frieda gazed back into the fire. 'Thursday's perhaps the worst day of the week. It's nothing in itself. It just reminds you that the week's been going on too long.'

Sasha pulled a face. 'That may be reading too much into it.' She leaned over the buggy and stroked her son's hair. 'I love him so much but sometimes when he's asleep I feel relieved and grateful. Is that a terrible thing to say?'

Frieda turned to her friend. 'Is Frank helping out?'

'He does his best. But he's so busy with his work. As he says, helping the guilty walk free.'

'That's his job,' said Frieda. 'He's a defence barrister and —'

She was interrupted by a ring at the door. Frieda gave Sasha a rueful look.

'You are going to answer it, aren't you?' Sasha said.

'I was tempted to hide.'

Opening the door, she heard a voice that seemed to come out of the darkness and was immediately enfolded in a hug.

'Frieda Klein,' said the woman. 'I'd know you anywhere. You look just like your mother.'

'I didn't know you'd ever met my mother.' She gestured towards the fireplace. 'This is my friend Sasha. This is Madeleine Bucknall.'

‘Maddie,’ said the woman. ‘Maddie Capel. I got married.’

Maddie Capel put down her large embossed bag and unwound a chequered scarf from her neck. She took off a heavy brown coat that she handed to Frieda. Underneath she was wearing a maroon crossover dress with wedge-heeled leather boots. There was a thick gold chain round her neck and small gold earrings in her lobes. She smelt of expensive perfume. She stepped towards the fire and looked into the buggy.

‘What a darling little thing,’ she said. ‘Frieda, is it yours?’

Frieda pointed at Sasha.

‘Just the sight of it makes me want to have another,’ said Maddie. ‘I love them at that age, when they’re like a warm bundle. Is it a boy or a girl?’

‘A boy.’

‘So cute. Is he walking yet?’

‘He’s only ten months old.’

‘You just need to be patient.’

Frieda pulled a chair up, close to the fire, and Maddie sat down. She had long brown hair, artfully styled into shagginess and streaked with blonde. Her face was carefully made up, but this only emphasized the tightness of the skin over the cheekbones, the little lines around the eyes and at the corners of the mouth. Frieda remembered her from school, cheerful, laughing, loud, but there was always an anxiety: being in the group or not in the group, having a boyfriend or not having a boyfriend.

‘Should I give you some privacy?’ said Sasha.

‘No, no, it’s lovely to meet a friend of Frieda’s. Do you live here as well?’

Sasha gave a faint smile. ‘No, I live with my partner. Somewhere else.’

‘Yes, of course. Thank you, thank you,’ she said, as Frieda handed her a mug of tea. She took a sip and looked around her. ‘Such a sweet little place you have here. Cosy.’ Another sip. ‘I read about you in the newspaper, Frieda. About how you helped on that terrible, terrible case with all those girls. And you rescued one of them.’

‘Only one,’ said Frieda. ‘And it wasn’t just me.’

‘How can people do things like that?’

There was a pause.

‘What was it you wanted to talk to me about?’

A gulp of tea.

‘I can’t believe we’ve lost touch,’ Maddie said. ‘You know that I still live in Braxton. Do you ever come back?’

‘No.’

‘Some of the old lot are still there.’ She gave a mischievous smile. ‘I remember you and Jeremy. I used to be rather jealous of you. He was quite a catch. He left, of course. Do you keep in touch with him?’

‘No.’

‘I married Stephen. Stephen Capel. Did you know him? We had some good years but it went wrong. He's remarried, but he still lives nearby.'

'When you phoned, you said there was something you needed to talk to me about.'

Another gulp of tea. Maddie looked around. 'Is there somewhere I can put this?'

Frieda took the mug from her.

'I've read about you in the paper.'

'You said.'

'More than once,' Maddie said. 'You've attracted quite a lot of attention.'

'Not by choice.'

'Yes, it must be difficult sometimes. But they said that apart from solving crimes . . .'

'That's not really . . .' Frieda began, and Sasha smiled again.

'No, but the articles mentioned that you're a psychologist.'

'I'm a psychotherapist.'

'I'm not very good on all the jargon,' said Maddie. 'I'm sure there's a difference. I don't know all the details, but from what I understand, people talk to you and you help them. Is that right?'

Frieda leaned forward. 'What is it you want?'

'It's not me.' Maddie gave a little laugh. 'If that's what you're thinking. Not that I couldn't do with some help. When Stephen left, I was crying for days and days. Weeks, really. I didn't know who to turn to.'

There was another pause.

‘I know things like that are terrible,’ said Frieda, ‘but, please, why have you come to see me?’

‘It’ll sound silly. It’s probably a waste of your time, my coming up all the way from the country.’

‘Should I leave?’ asked Sasha, again.

‘No,’ said Maddie. ‘We’re just old friends talking.’

‘Tell me what you want from me.’

Maddie hesitated. Frieda had experienced this moment dozens of times with her patients. One of the most difficult, precarious moments in therapy was that first naming of the patient’s fear. It was like jumping off a cliff edge into darkness.

‘It’s my daughter, Becky,’ said Maddie. ‘Rebecca. But everyone calls her Becky. She’s fifteen, almost sixteen.’

‘Has something happened?’

‘No, no, nothing like that. It’s hard to put into words. Becky was such a sweet little girl. When I looked at this little boy in the buggy, it reminded me of those days, when it was all so simple. I could just look after her. You know, when Becky was that age I thought I was going to have lots of children and I was going to be the best mother in the world and protect them from everything. I was so young when I had her, almost a child myself. And then . . .’ she breathed deeply, as if she were trying to control herself ‘. . . I couldn’t have another child. And then Stephen left. It was probably my fault. I tried to hide the way I felt from Becky but I didn’t do a very good job. She was only six. Little thing. And I was still in my twenties and all over the place.' Her voice wavered and she stopped for a moment. 'It must have hit her hard but I thought we'd come through it. I suppose I'd always dreaded the teenage years.' She glanced at Frieda. 'Maybe I was thinking of our own teenage years. We got up to one or two things that we probably regret now, didn't we?'

A voice inside Frieda was saying, What do you mean, 'we'? We weren't friends. We didn't get up to anything together. But she stayed silent and waited.

'In the last year or so she's changed. I know what you're going to say. She's just an adolescent. What am I worrying about? Well, I am worrying. To begin with, she was just withdrawn and moody and she wouldn't talk about anything. I wondered whether there were drugs or boys involved. Or drugs and boys. I tried to ask her about it. I tried to be sympathetic. Nothing worked.

'About a month ago, it got worse. She seemed different. She looked different. She stopped eating. She was on this stupid diet before, and was already rail-thin. Now I don't know how she's managing to stay alive. I've cooked everything I can think of, but she just moves it about on her plate. Even when she does eat, I think she makes herself sick. She misses school. She doesn't do homework.'

'Does she see her father?'

‘Stephen’s hopeless. He says it’s just a phase. She’ll get over it.’

‘What do you want from me?’ said Frieda.

‘Can’t you just talk to her? Isn’t that what you do? Just have a word with her?’

‘I’m not sure if you’re clear about what I do. I see patients over extended periods of time in order to explore problems they have in their life. I wonder if your daughter ought to see a school counsellor or a teacher.’

‘Becky won’t accept it. I’ve tried everything. I’m completely desperate. I don’t know who to turn to. Please. As a favour to an old school friend.’

Frieda looked at Maddie’s pleading expression. She didn’t like this woman from her past claiming to have been her friend and wanting something she couldn’t really give. She felt bad about Sasha being there to witness it. ‘I’m not sure I’m the right person for this,’ she said, ‘but if you bring your daughter here, I’ll talk to her. I’ll see if I can give you, or her, some advice. But I can’t promise anything.’

‘That’s wonderful. I can be there too, if you want.’

‘I’ll need to talk to her alone. At least at first. She needs to know it’s private and that she can say anything. That is, if she wants to say anything. She may not be ready to talk. Or, at least, ready to talk to me.’

‘Oh, I’m sure she’ll talk to you.’

Maddie stood up and fetched her coat as if she needed to get away before there was any possibility of Frieda withdrawing her offer. She pulled it on and wound the scarf back round her. Frieda felt she was watching someone put a shell on. In the doorway, after saying goodbye, Maddie suddenly turned round.

‘You know, there’s something in my daughter that frightens me,’ she said. ‘Isn’t that terrible?’

‘I’m only here to get my mother off my back.’

‘Why don’t you at least come in out of the wet?’

It was raining steadily, the sky a heavy unbroken grey and the leaves on the cobblestones sodden in the downpour.

Becky stepped inside, pulling the door shut. Her long dark hair was wet and sticking to her skull; her eyes, almost black, were large in her pinched face.

‘She wouldn’t even let me come here alone. I’m nearly sixteen, but she insisted on getting the train with me and coming all the way to Goodge Street. She’ll be there now. Buying more shoes or something. She’s got a thing about shoes.’

‘Sit by the fire. Can I take your jacket?’

‘I’m all right like this.’ The girl pulled her thick wool-len jacket more closely around her. Even though she was huddled inside it, Frieda could see how thin she was. Her wrists were tiny, her legs were as narrow at the thigh as at the knees, her cheekbones sharp. She looked malnourished, her skin stretched tight over her features.

‘Can I get you some some tea?’

‘No. Or do you have any herbal tea?’

‘Mint?’

‘Mint’s OK.’

‘Take a seat. Warm yourself. Biscuit?’

‘Just tea.’

Frieda left her leaning towards the flames, her delicate fingers held out to their warmth, and went into the kitchen. She made two mugs of tea – mint for Becky, Assam for her. Becky wrapped her hands around the mug for warmth and let the steam curl into her bitter little face.

‘It’s always hard to begin,’ said Frieda.

Becky drew her brows together in a frown and muttered something under her breath.

‘There’s no value in coming if you don’t choose to be here. I’m not going to force things out of you that you don’t want to tell, make you say things you’d prefer to keep secret. You’re here because your mother is worried about you and she asked me to talk to you. But I don’t want to talk to you or tell you what to do. I want to listen to you, if there are things you need to say to someone.’

Becky gave a violent shrug. ‘I’m OK.’

‘But you’re here.’

‘Only because she made me come.’

‘How did she make you?’

‘She said I only thought about myself. I was selfish. But that she was suffering too, and if I cared at all about anyone else, I could do this one small thing for her.’

‘You know I’m a therapist.’

‘So now she thinks I’m mad, as well as selfish.’

‘She thinks you may be in some kind of trouble.’

‘I know. Drugs. Or boys. That’s all she can think of. Is that what she told you?’

‘Are you in some kind of trouble?’

‘I’m fifteen, aren’t I? Isn’t that what being fifteen means? Everything feeling rubbish and shitty?’

‘Shitty. Is that how everything feels to you?’

‘Is that what you do?’ Becky lifted her fierce eyes and glared at Frieda. ‘You take a stupid random word and twist it around and say, “Oh, how interesting, she thinks everything’s shitty.” Shitty, crap, disgusting. I can do that too.’ She looked around her, her gaze resting on the chess table that Frieda had inherited from her father. ‘You play chess. You move pieces around on a board. Is that how you think of life? Like a great game you can win at?’

‘No. That’s not how I think of life.’

‘You’re famous, aren’t you? I Googled you, you know.’

‘And?’

‘It gave me the creeps. I’m not like those missing girls.’

‘But you’re not in a safe place right now, are you?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘You’re angry and anxious and unsettled. I know you’ve been missing school and falling behind with work.’

‘Oh, that’s what it’s about. I won’t get my precious
A stars.’

‘And I can see you’re not eating,’ Frieda continued.

Becky glowered at her. ‘Everyone I know is too fat or too thin,’ she said.

‘You won’t confide in your mother.’

‘She’s the last person I’d talk to. I’d rather go to my friends’ mothers than her.’

‘Your school must have a counsellor.’

‘I’m just working stuff out.’

‘What stuff?’

‘Just stuff. Don’t look at me as if you can see through me. It makes me feel sick.’

‘Why?’

‘It makes my skin crawl.’

Frieda scrutinized Becky. Then she said, ‘I know this will make you feel even angrier, but I want you to think a bit about your language.’

‘What do you mean, my language?’

‘Rubbish, shitty, crap, sick, skin crawling.’

‘So? They’re just words. Everyone uses words like that.’

‘It’s a language of disgust.’

‘So? Maybe I am disgusted.’

‘Why?’

‘Aren’t you going to ask me about my dad?’

‘Your father? Why?’

‘Mum said you’d want to know about him. She says that’s what it’s all about. She thinks I blame her for their divorce and let him off too lightly. She says that I can be furious with her because I know she won't leave me like he did – because she's stuck with me, for better or for worse, and that's what motherhood is all about. Not being able to escape your nasty daughter. I didn't ask to be born. She says I can't face up to the fact that my dad went off with this other woman, but I know it anyway, and that –'

'Hang on, Becky.' Frieda held up her hand. 'I don't want to hear what your mother thinks.'

'Why not? You're only seeing me because you were best friends at school or something.'

Frieda opened her mouth to protest, then stopped herself. 'That's not the point at all,' she said. 'This is about you, Becky Capel, not about your mother and certainly not about the fact that she and I knew each other many years ago. You can tell me things and I won't pass them on to her or anyone. You can feel safe here and you can say things that you feel unable to say to other people, because I'm a stranger.'

Becky turned her face away. There was a long silence.

'I make myself sick,' she muttered.

'Do you mean that you literally make yourself sick?'

'Both.' She gave a choked laugh. 'What do you call it? Metaphorically, that's the word. My teacher would be proud of me. I literally and metaphorically make myself sick.'

'Have you ever told anyone that before?'

‘No. It’s disgusting.’

‘Do you know why you do it?’

‘Food’s disgusting too. People taking gobbets of dead animal and bits of fish and mouldy cheese and dirty roots from the ground and putting them into their mouths and chewing them. And then swallowing so it all goes deep into their own bodies to rot away inside.’

Becky looked at Frieda as if to see the effect she was having. ‘Apples are all right,’ she continued. ‘And oranges.’

‘So you say you’re starving yourself because food disgusts you?’

‘I don’t like plums. I hate bananas. And figs.’

‘Becky . . .’

‘What? I hate this stupid conversation. Who cares what I eat? They’re starving all over the world and here one poor little rich girl is being sick because . . .’

‘Because?’

‘Because. Because nothing. It’s just a phase.’

‘And truanting from school.’

‘It’s boring.’

‘School’s boring?’

‘Yeah.’

‘So if school’s boring, what do you find interesting?’

‘I used to like swimming, especially in the sea when the waves are big. Swimming in the rain.’

Despite herself, Frieda felt the tug of an old memory, the grey North Sea and breakers surging towards her, shingle shifting under her bare feet. 'But not any longer?'

'I haven't been for a bit. And now it's nearly winter. I hate being cold. I get cold to my bones.'

Frieda was beginning to reply, when there was a rap at her front door. Maddie was on the doorstep, standing under an open umbrella, her cheeks pink and damp, a shopping bag in one hand.

'Am I too early?'

'Early for what?'

'I thought the session would be over by now.'

'It's not a session, it's a conversation.'

Maddie closed her umbrella and leaned forward conspiratorially. 'What do you think?' she half whispered.

'I'm sorry?'

'What do you make of Becky?'

'I think she's a very intelligent young woman who's sitting a few feet away from us, probably able to hear everything we say.'

'But has she said anything?'

'I'll call or email you this evening. We can talk about it then.'

'She's going to be all right, isn't she? You are going to help?'

A few hours later, Frieda sat in her study at the top of the house, listening to the rain on the roof and the wind against the windows. She sat for several minutes in deep thought and then she picked up the phone. When Maddie answered, Frieda could hear the eagerness in her voice.

‘I was hoping it would be you. Becky wouldn’t tell me anything about her visit to you. I hope she wasn’t surly.’

‘No. She wasn’t surly.’

‘Did you discover anything?’

‘I’m not sure what you mean by that. But I think your daughter needs help.’

‘That’s why I made her see you.’

‘I saw her today in my house for a chat – because you asked me to see her. I think she needs professional help.’

‘You make it sound so serious!’ Maddie gave an anxious, grating laugh. ‘I just need a bit of advice, someone to point me in the right direction. You can do that, can’t you? Get to the bottom of her moods and put her back on track.’

‘It’s important to keep clear boundaries. She needs to see a therapist, not someone who – in her eyes – is connected to her mother.’

‘You’re a therapist, aren’t you? As for being connected . . .’ Her tone changed, grew chillier. ‘We never really hung about with the same crowd, did we? So we needn’t worry about that.’

‘I’ll see Becky for a proper consultation,’ said Frieda. ‘I’ll make an assessment, and I’ll tell you what

I think she needs, and I can recommend someone for her to see, although she would need to be involved in that decision.'

Maddie's tone became warm again. 'That's lovely. But what do you mean by a proper consultation? It sounds a bit intimidating.'

'It will be in my room in Bloomsbury. I'll give you the address. It will last exactly fifty minutes. I'll charge you seventy-five pounds.'

'You'll charge me?'

'Yes.'

'That seems a bit cold-blooded, I must say.'

'I saw Becky today because I know you,' said Frieda. 'Next time I'll see her as a patient. That means you must pay me, as if I were an electrician or a plumber.'

'You're being very stern. Is that how much you charge everyone?'

'It's an average fee. If you're not in the position to pay that much, I'll make a concession.'

'I've got plenty of money, thank you, Frieda. That's one thing Stephen did leave me with. It just seems rather odd, paying for a little favour.'

'It's not a favour any more. This is what Becky needs and this is what I do.'