John de Granville Graham-Youll

Who was Unkind to Animals and Paid the Consequences

There never was a Boy so Cruel
As John de Granville Graham-Youll.
He could not pass a dog without Giving the beast a Fearful Clout.
He liked to yank on Horses' Reins
And kick their Shins and pull their Manes.
And as for cats, his Favourite Trick
Involved a Very Pointed Stick.
He tugged the Legs off Spiders and
Whatever else would come to hand.
With Limbless Slugs, his great resolve
Was watching them slowly dissolve
Beneath a Pinch of Salt, which he
Would sprinkle over liberally.

One day the lad – just for a lark
Went off to a Safari Park
In search of Creatures yet to see
How cruel a teenage boy could be,
And there it was he came across
A Very Large Rhinoceros.
But though he Poked and Kicked at it,
The Rhino didn't care a bit.
For as we know, his Wrinkly Skin
Is very, very far from thin.
(As Mr Kipling described just so
In stories many years ago)
The Rhino, who was unaware
That Master John was even there
Decided it was Time to Sit
And crushed the boy a little bit.
And thus John keeps his Derriere
Forever in a Wheelchair.

The good news, I am glad to say
Is that John learned a lot that day

And now he fights to Save the Whale

But that is quite another tale.

Moral:

Unless you are that way inclined

Avoid approaching from behind.

Julia

Who Shopped until she was Dropped

Julia Smithson got her Kicks
From shopping hard at Harvey Nicks
And other emporia where
She bought more clothes than she could wear;
A frock, once placed against her chest,
Would almost always be purchased.

For Julia had Great Passion
For what magazines call Fashion;
She just never learned to ration
Her appetites – and, oh my dear,
It cost her, as you now shall hear.

Her father, a millionaire,

Naturally became aware
Just how much his Darling Heir
Was spending on her Underwear.
Thus impoverished, he at once
Forbad her her inheritance.
So now she is an ex-heiress
Who works weekends at M&S.

Moral:

If you Shop until you Drop
One day the Trust Fund will Stop

Nicholas

Who refused to Tidy his Bedroom and Died Alone

One thing that causes much Distress

For parents is, of course, the Mess

In which a child can leave their room.

Oh how it makes them Rage and Fume!

Now normally a child can be

Persuaded (eventually)

To Rally To and wave a Duster

So that their room can pass Muster.

But not so Nick, a Mogul's son

Who lived in Trendy Islington.

He never tidied up his room

And thus went early to his doom.

He left the place in such a state
It makes me shudder to relate.
His Bed, of course, was never made.
His clothes were everywhere displayed.
Like so many north London boys
He never put away his toys:
Discarded Teddies, bits of Bike,
Boring jig-saws he didn't like,
Remote-control cars, Model Planes,
Double-O gauge electric trains,
Unread novels, an empty box,
A bag of useless Sandstone Rocks,
Computer games whose screens were dim,
An Action Man with missing limb,
Cowboy guns, a festering sponge,
Batteries oozing Noxious Gunge.
There was within this Habitat
Not room enough to swing a cat!

Nick's parents tried to get the lad
To tidy up his Squalid Pad
But he had long taken the view

That this work was not his to do.

The room was such a mess that he

One day got lost and Missed his Tea.

Not only that, his Supper too

Which for a boy will never do.

His parents called the Police and more

Who struggled through the bedroom door

But even they got stuck amid

The mess and never found the kid.

So some days later it transpired

That the Slovenly Boy expired

Of Starvation, and not before

He'd wished he'd tidied up some more.

Moral:

Do not get lost in north London

Without a decent packed luncheon.

Gregory

Who Listened but Did Not Hear and was Silenced Forever

Gregory was a Silly Sod

Who never turned off his iPod.

All day and night his headphones hissed

As he ran through his long playlist

Of all those Ghastly Modern Bands

That no parent understands.

In consequence of this, therefore,

He never heard, one day, the roar

Of an approaching Wild Boar

Which knocked him off his feet, it's true,

But cut down on his listening too.

For now Greg spends more time with God

Who confiscated his iPod

And said that Silence would instead

Be better for a boy who's Dead.

Moral:

If you wish to reach old age

Download silence from Mr Cage.

Evangeline Smyth

Who paid the Ultimate Price for television

Evangeline Smyth, known as Evie,
Died young from watching Too Much TV.

A slothful girl from Enfield Locks

She spent all day before the box.

Her eyes to the screen were glued;

She rarely paused Except for Food.

All day long – there she sat.

No wonder she became So Fat.

She slouched so long inside her chair

That soon not just her eyes were square.

And it was all that she could do

To get up to go to the loo.

One day in spring it happened that

The food ran out inside her flat.

For most of us, it's no big deal
To miss out on the evening meal.
But for Ms Smith, the Shock was Great
She flew into a Grievous State
She rang for Pizza, Fish and Chips
And Curries hot that scald your lips
But everywhere she was told
"Your call is valued: can you hold?"
So thus famished, with Rumbling Tum
Ms Smyth got off her Bulging Bum
And left the flat to Forage Wide
For food enough for her inside.

But as she crossed the road, her gaze
Was captured by the vast arrays
Of TVs in the TV shop.
Thus mesmerised, she had to stop.
Her Favourite Soap! A Crucial plot!
But in her daze she failed to spot
The Fast Approaching Omnibus
Which knocked her flat and squashed her thus:
And so she joined that home so high

For Couch Potatoes in the Sky.

Moral:

The moral is, I have to say,

Always send for takeaway.
